INTRODUCTION: An overview of the Arab World as a cultural/social context for problem formulation “women, intangible heritage and development”

The Arab cultural area comprises 23 countries of the Arab League namely: Lebanon, Syria, Iraq, Jordan, Palestine, Kuwait, United Arab Emirates, Qatar, Bahrain, Saudi Arabia, Oman, Yemen, Comoro Islands, Egypt, Sudan, Djibouti, Somalia, Libya, Tunisia, Algeria, Morocco, Occidental Sahara and Mauritania.

Although it is made up of an expanded area of the Arab culture dominated by Arabic language, Sunni Islam and ways of life founded on the patriarchal type of family, the Arab World does not consist of a homogeneous setting. In fact, each region has distinctive features due to the preservation of an ancient cultural foundation despite the acculturation process engaged during the Arab conquest. The subcultural areas of the Arab World are the following:

The Fertile Crescent (Lebanon, Syria, Iraq, Jordan and Palestine): The population of this group of countries is very heterogeneous. It is made up of a majority of Sunni Arabs, and of minorities such as Shiia, Alaoui, Druze, Ismaeli, in addition to Oriental Christians such as Orthodox Greeks, Catholic Greeks, Maronites, Orthodox Syrians, Assyrians, Chaldeans, and Jews. The Fertile Crescent also consists of ethnic minorities like Kurds, Armenians, Circassians, Turkmen…

The Arabian Peninsula (Kuwait, Qatar, Bahrain, Saudi Arabia, Oman, Yemen). Arabs who belong to different Moslem communities inhabit this region. While the Sunni predominate in Saudi Arabia, the UAE, Qatar and a large part of Yemen the Shiia predominate in Bahrain, Kuwait, and eastern Saudi Arabia. The population of Oman is Kharigi whereas that of northern Yemen is composed of Zaidite and a small minority of Ismaili.

The Maghreb ( Libya, Tunisia, Algeria, Morocco) was entirely converted to Sunni Islam. Meanwhile, a large minority of Berber with different proportions in each country claims a culture and consequently a distinct identity.

Arab Moslem populations inhabit countries fringing sub-Saharan Africa (Sudan, Somalia, Djibouti, Comoro Islands and Mauritania) with a variety of ethnic groups.

The religious and ethnic complexity of the Arab World multiplies the cultural and judicial sources of diverse populations. In addition to this cultural particularity, the countries of the region are engaged in the development process at different pace. The latter are conditioned by their own resources as well as by their economic, political and cultural settings. Consequently, in the evaluation of the problem “women, intangible heritage and development” these factors must be included.

-Ethnic diversity grants women the identity of the groups they belong to. Despite the omnipresence of Arabic, the multiplicity of languages and dialects (Kurd, Turkmen, Assyrian, Circassian, Armenian, Berber…) is emphasized. In this case, the intangible heritage they transmit of which the language is the principle vehicle is most varied.

The patriarchal society of the Arab World dictates to women patterns of behavior and thinking inspired by a value system based upon honor. The implicit rules emanating from this system lead to the prevention of infractions (ex: the practice of excision in African countries) or their sanction (ex: the crime of honor).

However, the preeminence of the patriarchal system and the unwritten law that governs it must not conceal the diversity of the current personal statuses in the different religious communities in the Arab World. The latter introduce indeed major and minor differences at the level of action and thinking of the woman transmitter of models.

-The three lifestyles dominating in the Arab World impose on women attitudes and behavior related to each one of them that are sometimes in contradiction with those of the global society. Besides, the integration of these lifestyles in the dynamics of change modifies the role of the woman in the transmission of intangible heritage. This role may disappear or it may disguise into a more modern form, better adapted to the new social organization.
In summary, intangible heritages related to cultures and lifestyles of the Arab World make certain populations hence women more permeable than others to development.

I-Research Methodology

A-Preliminary Phase

The first step of the research consists of establishing a preliminary list of research centers and of NGOs in the Arab World concerned by the issues of women in the development process. Once a the list of these bodies set up, faxes and e-mails were sent to inform them of the project, to ask them to report of their different activities in the domain and to request a list of their publications. A deadline was fixed for the 30th of March 2001. Few were the bodies that answered to our request or sent any literature. This means that they have little to say on the subject matter.

B-Internet Research

Data collection from the Internet started. It took into consideration the division of sub cultural areas for measuring at best the different factors likely to influence the transmission by women of intangible heritage in relation to development in the country and to the direct regional environment. This research has systematically explored the majority of sites related to the group of countries of the Arabian Peninsula and of the Fertile Crescent. It also gathered information on the remaining part of the Arab World when available.

C-Field Research

The investigation on the Internet has shown that the sites for NGOs concerned with women in Lebanon were few compared to those in other countries. A series of visits to active international NGOs in Lebanon or Lebanese, Palestinian and Armenian based on a list established by the UNDP was accomplished.

Along with the Internet, researches were carried out in libraries and book fairs to construct an annotated bibliography.
II-BIBLIOGRAPHY: WOMEN, INTANGIBLE HERITAGE AND DEVELOPMENT

This bibliography does not cover the complete researches done on women in the Arab World. It tries at best to be exhaustive to put in evidence the rare works related to intangible heritage conveyed and transmitted by women as well as its relation with development. The subject as presented by the UNESCO project is not found in its integrality. In most cases, one or two elements of the problematic appear but not the three together.

In fact, the predominating themes in these books are women's relations with religion, Islam in particular, but also their rights and claims such as access to learning, work and political life. In the same way, the theme of social economic changes leading to the modification of the woman's status and her position in comparison to family, work and society is also frequent. The general problematic handles especially the theme of women between tradition and modernity with what it incurs on religion, Islam in particular, and the patriarchal structures as well as the values they convey honor in particular.

Elements of the intangible heritage such as religion and value system guiding behavioral patterns are found throughout this literature without being the central theme. Along with these general thoughts, specific problems seem to affect women in every region or every country: crime of honor, excision…

Biologists, doctors, hospital-attendants, demographers…especially in Egypt and surrounding countries appeal to the value system and to the traditional know how to explain customs (excision, early marriage…) affecting women's health, their reproductive behavior and the way they care for their children. In this case, traditional medicine is also taken into account.

Moreover, the woman and non-material culture constitute subject matter for articles and ethnographic works that explain at best the cultural particularities of different ethnic groups. However, these works do not define non-material culture as intangible heritage and consequently, are not particularly interested by the modes of transmission by women.

Local researchers tackle the issue of women and development and treat it at different historical angles. Some authors go back to antiquity to prove that women have played an important role in development all the time at different stages (ex: Fahmy, 1999). On the other hand, others draw their examples from natural history (ex: Chaaban, 1991). Some, try to make a final list of the results obtained after ten years dedicated to women by the UNESCO (1975-1985) (Selim, 1991). All the authors tried to define models of development of women through education, professional insertion or through direct intervention at the level of local societies… In this case, the discourse focuses on what should be done rather than on what exists. In addition, the arab-muslim culture, the values it conveys and the usages and customs are rarely mentioned. They are represented as hindering development especially when it is a question of women.

  Scholars review ongoing debate about Arab women, survey women’s participation in economic development and political action, and explore Arab women’s roles and social relationships at a time of great social change. The original research and fresh thinking presented in this volume are invaluable to all interested in the changing circumstances of Arab women as old ideas governing their status are challenged by new ones.

Women and Islam

Leyla AHMED’s book is a broad yet complex treatment of women’s experience from pre-Islamic Mesopotamia to the contemporary Middle East. The author delves into the rise of male dominance and misogyny in the region and its gradual integration into Muslim culture through the process of conquest. In covering the rise of Islam, Ahmed also notes the power of the chroniclers who could omit, suppress, or emphasize historical details affecting historical readings of events. The author focuses on Egyptian discussing the premodern period, and the debates over gender emerging in the 20th century. Ahmed argues that women hardly wished to hold onto a social order that repressed them with a combination of regional traditions and Islam practiced in a misogynist manner. But the shifting of the social order took place at a time when colonialism wielded a picture of Muslims as an inferior people. The Victorian establishment, Ahmed writes, “appropriated the language of feminism” (p.152) to attack Muslim culture, especially in the battle over veiling, thereby fundamentally affecting future considerations of gender, power and the state in the public mind.

Women and Health

Women and Family

The family is a political microsociety wherein the exercise of power is defined. With regard to its members, the relations between them and its objectives, the problem arises, regardless of the type of society or culture, of woman’s place and power within the family. Given its universality, procreation offers a vantage point reflecting on such issues. The desire to have children and the way two opposite, even antagonistic, sociocultural groups satisfied it provides convincing proof that having or not having children is, above all, a social act. Demographic policies (whether for spacing, restricting or favoring birth) always concern women and sometimes considers them the key of success. Does this means used by this power.

Algeria

Algerian women’s determination to achieve emancipation, a determination that can be based only on democratic movement, has encountered an islamist movement (the Islamic Salvation Front), which has grown rapidly and significantly since 1988. What about the legal status of women-the Family Code that passed in 1984, is close to the chari’a? The Front has clearly voiced its intentions to send women back into the house, limit them to “producing” Moslems, refuse the mixing of the sexes and consequently, moralize society in order to put an end to the crisis. This definitely proves that the future-democratic or totalitarian- of Algerian society has to do with women. Is the alternative between laicism or “religious fascim”? What kind of laicism?

Opposite the logic of honor (nif and horma) which governs relations between the sexes in Algeria, women’s paid work outside the household involves a continual relationship of subversion/neutralization. Three discourses (of women, men and adolescents in the last year of secondary school) about this work are shaped by two constants: on the one hand, sexual identity is a matter of continual interrogation (“a man is a man” “To be a man and a woman at the same time”; etc.) and on the other hand, there is almost obsessional reference to the code of honor (concealment of the economic dimension of work; work as prostitution; etc.).

A child belongs to the bed. The narrow interpretation by Algerian lawmakers of this hadith by the prophet is accountable for the legal inexistence of children born out of wedlock. Placed in its historical context and interpreted broadly, this hadith logically resolves this situation in a way that avoids the subterfuges proposed by Islamic jurists. Imbued with the rules of Moslem law and the narrow interpretation of the hadith, the Algerian family, conscious that illegitimate births defy social values, seeks to save its honor by keeping news of such a birth from spreading. It brings pressure to bear on the confused mother so that she forsake, abandon or kill her new-born. The state has not measured up to this situation, since it has neither provided social services to single mothers nor passed laws taking into account the babe’s interests.

-BOUCEBCI Mahfoud, Filiation, Identity and Social Roles in a Changing World, in Peuples méditerranéens, N°48-49, juil.-déc., 1989. Massive, rapid changes are at work in Algerian culture and society, a full-fledged part of Arab-Berber North Africa. Concomitantly, there are deep, radical transformations in collective and individual psychopathologies. With respect to Islam and its theological input into filiation, women’s status raises fundamental questions about individual and group identities. New observations can thus be made about adolescents and the vulnerability of women’s new social status in urban areas. Social, cultural and political events in recent decades reveal both the intensity of resistance in everyday life to the changes under way and the paradoxical ambivalence of the feminine intelligentia.

To take our science and technology from the West but to keep our mares has been the position of Algerian nationalism since the 1930s. Changing the Family and women’s status was criticized as a sign of westernisation, whereas the national identity, founded on Arabic Islamism, has claimed to be incarnated in “woman” as the warrant of authenticity and guardian of traditions. In its efforts to control modernization by keeping women on the side of permanence and tradition and adapting to economic and social transformations, the State has imposed models of the woman militant and worker who remain, above all, a mother and wife. This subordination to the family confers nationality on women while depriving them of citizenship, an ambiguity that has been enacted in the legal code. The historical phases since the 1920s of the modernization of the family are analysed, as are also the difficulties of Algerian feminism in a society undergoing crisis—a society where family is a refuge and the State partly finds its legitimacy on the relegation of women out of the political sphere. Algerian feminism has principally demanded equal rights.

After a sociological examination of the world of the women who sing the ray, a look at her songs, illustrated with excerpts, reveals the forms of this existential lamentation, the expression of moral suffering and a hedonic counterdiscourse about free love and the joy of drinking together. The sixat songs provide a contrasting image of women as being lucid but hopeless, egalitarian but dominated, the provocative bearers of an ideology of personal freedom without any coherent project of social change.

Jenning’s research is on the informal and formal economic roles of modern Nubian women in West Aswan especially in their relationship to the tourist trade. Analysis of aspects of property and power shows the West Aswani women to be creative and entrepreneurial in the utilization of their economic networks.

The book provides theoretical insight and analysis of the power relations between women’s activism, Islamist thought and praxis, and the Egyptian State (1970s to 1990s). Contemporary feminist debates among women’s NGOs are examined, and the different perceptions of gender roles among Islamist men and women are presented and contrasted. Three feminists streams are identified as both shaping and being shaped by the dynamics of interaction between political Islam and State regimes.

And “why does society condemn female singers and dancers?” (p.2); In her quest for answers, following a historical background, she investigates the concepts of marginality, gender, honor and shame, and “feminine and masculine” behaviour.

Diane SINGERMAN’s book focuses on the “power of the popular sector” (p.3) in Egypt; She highlights the important role of women in sustaining the household and large community. Women are leaders in informal saving associations (gam’iyyat) and they business women (dallalat) who exploit deficiencies in the government distribution systems and provide services to their community. It is these informal networks that, like their formal counterparts, “articulate and aggregate the interests of their constituents” (p.172).

This book examines self-images and self-imaging processes of contemporary women veiled and unveiled, perceive themselves, their identity, and the changing political and social environment in which they live. The author is particularly concerned with the use of archetypes in shaping personal consciousness through a process of “syzygy”, a conjoining process that may influence the recipient to dramatize or internalize historical or mythological events.

Iraq

This book is the first scholarly work on feminism and nationalism in the context of one of the most persistent nationalist movements of the twentieth century Kurdish nationalism. While a considerable volume of the literature on the Kurds deals with their nationalism, the place of women in this nationalist movement has rarely been studied. The relationship between nationalism and feminism is quite complex and conflictive. While some progress has recently been made in theorizing the relationships, there is a dearth of empirical studies of the topic. The contributors to this book examine aspects of Kurdish women's lives in light of current theoretical debates. For the first time, the contributors apply gender critique to the understanding of the nationalism of the world's largest non-state nation, the Kurds. The book introduces a gender dimension into the growing literature on Kurdish nationalism. The diversity of Kurdish women's lives and experiences, from their membership in the parliament to military activism to mothering is documented. At the same time, it provides extensive evidence and analysis, which questions the widely accepted claim that Kurdish women enjoy more freedom compared with their Arab, Turkish and Persian sisters.
Many of the topics in the book have never been addressed in Kurdish studies, for instance, gender and self-determination, women and Sufism, feminism and nationalism, and women and health choices. The editor's introductory chapter is the first survey of Kurdish women's studies, and provides a critical overview of the state of research, and examines theoretical and methodological issues as well as the politics and political economy of research on the women of a non-state nation.

Kuwait

This book focuses on the main socio-economic changes happened in the Gulf countries. It stresses on the active role of women in the ancient modes of production as pearls fishing or agriculture. It analyses too the impact of social transformations caused by the oil income on the women’s status. Actually, women remain at home and a few work in some sectors of activity.

Oil income launched Kuwait on a path of economic modernization, the myriad effects of which include pressure on boundaries separating Kuwaiti from non Kuwaiti, elites from other social groups and classes, an women from men. Using gender as a lens, aspects of Kuwaiti’s population policy, entitlement programs, employment and housing patterns, and family life are examined. Motives and strategies for maintaining traditional values are analysed in the context of development imperatives and national security concerns. The dilemmas facing Kuwaitis and their leaders are shown to be complex and solutions often incompatible. The authors warn that policies based on the continued subordination of women often fail to provide outcomes potentially more destabilizing than the situations they are intended to ameliorate.

Palestine

The Intifadah has profoundly affected the lives of Palestinian Women. The writings in this lively collection examine the change it has brought to women and girls of all ages and backgrounds in the West Bank and Gaza.

Intifada seems to have considerably increased women’s political visibility in the Palestinian national movement. By taking a place on the social and political scene, these women have made it possible to constitute a national community in the modern sense of the word. This has implied the weakening of clannish bonds. The importance, in the Intifada, of the symbolic dimension and the political scope of activities having to do with the personal sphere give a genuine place to women’s struggles. Feminist demands have now arisen, but they are still timid and do not address the questions of desire and sexuality.

Dans cette étude une variante de l’Islam officiel syrien, le soufisme féminin d’Etat. Sur ce réseau passent les messages de l’enseignement religieux ainsi que les informations qui servent à des fins, économiques, sociaux et politiques.

This book focuses on the values change in two Syrian villages near Damascus: Sahnaya and Zakiya. Many factors as the population growth, the education, the technology, the mass media, the public institutions and the nearness of town modified the traditional system of values especially at the family level.

Raymond MAALOULY’s study examines the evolution of family in the Ghouta of Damascus after the agrarian reform. The transformation of land tenure permitted the emergence of nuclear family, the increase of education level of youngsters and the professional insertion of women.

In Damascus, there are a number of different places where women are active, when they jointly occupy part of their normal day, where they communicate intensely with one another, and where they attempt to cope together with their problems. Temporary disassociating and exclusive women’s domains exist within women’s public domain and form one element of women’s culture.

The construction of social reality, as undertaken by Damascus women, indicates two publics: a female public and a male public. The female public is the women’s world. It can be devided into three areas: private areas of the family, domestic informal women`s domains and out-of-house formal women`s domains. The use and participation in informal and formal domains creates set points in the daily, weekly and yearly schedule of the women. Women`s domains are indicators of social order. Informal and formal women`s domains contribute towards gender separation and help stabilise the existing Arabian-islamic social order.

Tunisia

Pilgrimages to marabouts in northern Tunisia are being revived. By their form and meaning, these pilgrimages are not a mere return to past religiosity but an adaptation to contemporary life. They help women recreate places for sociality, meeting festivity and transgression of social rules. Through the worship of saint, the popular classes can elude the social rules, such as the dowry, that they are unable to keep; Pilgrimages and marabouts are still suspect in the eyes of ulemas and islamists.

Although the Tunisian state has written a relative equality between the sexes into law, women in rural areas, where society has not change much, have benefited very little from this state feminism. As prisoners of an honor code, these women prefer grounding their counterpower in the magical-religious sphere. In contrast, well-off women dwelling in cities have since independence, acquired an egalitarian consciousness; with diplomas equal to or better than men’s, they have forced men at the workplace within the couple to renegotiate power, which is no longer a definitively male prerogative. State feminism as well as equal rights for women are now under attack from Islamist movements, which see them as a form of westernisation. Poor women in urban areas have joined these movements, because wearing the veil makes it permissible for them to go out of the house, diffuse recognized knowledge and thus both acquire and exercise new power legitimated by religion.

-TRIKI Souad, "The Marginalisation of Rural Women in Tunisia's

Kifah is the word usually used to refer to sexual activity in Tegma and Rouyi, two areas in the forests of the Khroumir mountains in northwestern Tunisia. This systematic usage is intriguing since this word’s proper meaning, of which villagers in these areas are well aware, is struggle or combat. Why is a term referring to warfare used for sex? On the basis of interviews, an interpretation is made that relates this bellicose connotation to the space of dwellings and society as a whole. A field of observation is thus staked out leading from sexuality through spatiality to society.

In the period before Yemeni unification in 1990, both the northern and southern states had enacted laws with regard to the status of women, embodying the distinctive ideological orientations of the two countries and their attitudes to Islamic law and Yemeni custom. Following unity, a single code has been promulgated. Yet, this unified code involves diverse legal and political principles. In a broader sense, policy on women’s rights has continued to be the site of competing political ideologies in a society riven with conflict.

An Nahdad Association (Bahrani Women's awakening)
The association came into existence in 1995 and is a pioneer in the region. An Nahdad Association strives to empower women through educational and cultural programs such as eradicating illiteracy, resolving marital disputes and divorce problems, providing day-care facilities for working mothers, etc. With the passage of time and after several young educated females joined An Nahdad, it's policy started to change. The approach became more radical, with members calling for social change and more involvement in the social and political life.

Awal Association

Established in 1970, Awal association is committed to social and political work. Members of Awal are involved in the cultural, social and political activities taking place in their society.

The Child and Mother Welfare Association

Established in 1960, the Child and Mother Welfare Association is a conservative organization whose members are housewives. Most of its women members come from influential families in Bahrain.

One of the founding tenants of The Child & Motherhood Welfare Society is its strong belief and commitment to serving the needs of Arab women and children living in diverse and developing societies. This dedicated commitment has been the key cornerstone in establishing the Information Centre for Women and Children (ICWC) in 1995, which serves as a regional information network centre for the State of Bahrain, neighbouring GCC States and other Arab countries.

Some of the principle aims and objectives of the Information Centre for Women and Children are:

To establish a scientific database for collecting, storing and disseminating information that reflects the current and future conditions of Arab women and children in areas of social, health, familial, educational and economic development.

To establish a collaborative information network which ‘pools’ information from indigenous sources and regional Arab nations (e.g., The Arab Council for Childhood and Development, Cairo) in order to create a recognised international forum for developing action and research strategies which focus on Arab women and children.

Provide a library of resources (i.e., information, publications and literature) enabling government and non-government bodies to draw upon for developing and directing future political, social and economic policies in the related fields of health, education and welfare.

To build a resource bank for promoting future documentation and research.

The Ibn Khaldun Center for Development Studies (ICDS) is a Cairo based professional research organization created in 1988. The main objective of the Center is the advancement of applied social sciences with special emphasis on Egypt, the Arab World and the Third World.
Women in Development Program

Gender issues have attained primacy in current development thinking and the role of women as agents of development has come to the forefront of the debate. Thus their input in policy making, implementing and monitoring processes has become an important aspect of the needed change in modern development methods. Women have become important targets for development efforts all over the world.

The Women in Development program is conscious of the pivotal role women play in social transformation when they are appropriately mobilized and empowered. This is achieved through greater representation in the policy making apparatus of the state and society and greater latitude for personal and property rights. Thus the program aims to conduct an in depth study of the present status of Egyptian and Arab women at political and policy making levels, including their representation in parliament.

While it cannot claim pioneering in this area, ICDS has focused its research and advocacy on women in public life. The ICDS axiom is that sustainable development has to be participatory; and women representation in NGOs, local and national councils is an indicator of such development. Recent WID projects included organizing Egyptian Arab women parliamentarians and other women NGOs for participation in the 1994 Cairo International Conference on Population and Development (ICPD), the Copenhagen Social Development Summit (March 1995) and the Beijing Fourth World Conference on Women (September 1995). Out of these and similar activities, and in cooperation with other ICDS programs, the Egyptian Association of Women Voters (HODA) was recently initiated. A similar project, Empowering Egypt's Young Girls, is underway which combines micro-credit, literacy, legal aid, family planning and voter registration for women. WID projects are carried out with several Egyptian NGOs and international organizations including the Germany based Freidrich Ebert Stiftung, the European commission, EZE, and Grameen Bank.

The National Council for Women, Egypt, is a newly established council, directly affiliated to the presidency. Its aim is to empower Egyptian women. in all fields of life. It also aims at enabling women to better preserve their national identity and heritage. The council is presided by Egypt's First Lady, Mrs. Suzanne Mubarak. Ambassador Mervat Tallawy acts as Secretary General. In addition, 30 public figures and experts in women's issues are permanent members of the Council. The council's mandate is as follows: Advise the society on its constitutional institutions on public policies that target the development and empowerment of women to better perform their economic and social roles and the integration of women's efforts in comprehensive development programs. Draw up a national plan for the advancement of women and solving the problems confronting them. Follow up and evaluate this implementation of the public policy on women's issues and submit the council's proposals, recommendations and observations in this regard to the relevant authorities. Advice on laws and decrees pertaining to women before they are presented to the concerned authorities and recommend draft laws and decrees deemed necessary to improve women's conditions. Voice opinions on all agreements related to women. Represent women at international conferences and organizations dealing with women's issues. Set up a Documentation Center to collect information, data, studies and researches on women as well as conduct its own studies and researches in this area. Hold conferences, debates, symposia and seminars on women's issues. Organize awareness-raising training sessions on women's rights, duties and role in society. Issue newsletters, magazines and publications related to its goals and mandate. Discuss any issues to be referred to the Council by the President of the Arab Republic of Egypt.

The Council’s major program efforts in the Middle East involve strengthening institutional and professional research capacities, addressing needs for comprehensive youth policies and programs, and improving reproductive health services. Active projects are ongoing in eight countries in the Middle East, North Africa, and West Asia: Algeria, Egypt, Iran, Jordan, Lebanon, Sudan, Turkey, and the West Bank and Gaza.

Egypt

The Council's program in Egypt focuses on strengthening the research community in its ability to address important population-related issues. The agenda of work is defined according to local priorities as these intersect with the international expertise of the Council. Current programs include both research and public policy initiatives. Broad areas of work include women's reproductive health services, health care reform, adolescent transitions to adulthood, and gender-based violence.

Researchers are examining the social and cultural factors that influence women's and men's health-seeking behaviors and well-being. Interdisciplinary research is being conducted at the community level to determine those conditions that affect the prevalence and perceptions of diseases, linkages between reproductive health and family planning services, improving the quality of these services, and examining physicians' perceptions of women's health.

Lebanon

A study to ascertain the reproductive health of women in two villages in the Beqaa, a rural area of Lebanon, was conducted by the Reproductive Health Working Group. The study builds upon previous work in Egypt and Jordan. Data analysis is underway and publications are forthcoming.

West Bank and Gaza

The program in West Bank and Gaza is the newest in the West Asia and north Africa (WANA) region. The Population Council's FRONTIERS Project is helping to conduct a pilot health project in selected areas in the West Bank and Gaza, in collaboration with CARE International. The project's goal is to improve the health of Palestinian women and their children by improving the quality of antenatal and postpartum services. This health project will be implemented over 28 months, in partnership with five Palestinian nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), and in coordination with the Palestinian Ministry of Health and other donor agencies.
Sudan
A reproductive morbidity study has been undertaken by the Reproductive Health Working Group in two districts of Khartoum, Sudan. The study amassed a wealth of information on women's gynecological health. Plans are underway to bring together examples of community-based studies that illustrate the advantages and shortcomings of this methodology. The findings of such a synthesis will emphasize commonalties and differences in women's experience of reproductive morbidity in the region.

The WATC operates as a coalition between several women's committees and institutions that lobbies on behalf of women's rights and issues. WATC organizations work together in order to eliminate all forms of discrimination against women, an integral part of achieving a democratic society that respects human rights. Further, they promote international and local cooperation in women's issues and the building of bridges of cross-cultural understanding. Within the last few years, much has been achieved in the domain of women's rights in Palestine through the devoted efforts of the organization. Among the top priorities of the WATC is the enhancement of awareness among social institutions regarding gender issues and women's rights in Palestine and the Arab World.

United Arab Emirates
The UAE Women's Federation

In 1973, Sheikha Fatima bint Mubarak, the wife of the President, set up the first women's organization, pioneering the establishment of similar bodies countrywide. Many of the factors that helped transform the life of women came after the establishment, in 1975, of the UAE Women's Federation. It was set up by Sheikha Fatima as an umbrella organization, covering women's societies functioning at the emirate level. Today member associations are: Abu Dhabi Women's Development Society, Dubai Women's Development Society, Sharjah Women’s Development Society, Umm Al Mou'meneen Society in Ajman, Umm Al Qaiwain Women's Development Society and the Ras Al Khaimah Women's Development Society. Depending on the geographical size of the emirate, the individual societies may have more than one branch, and there are now 31 branches of the 6 societies, many of these societies operate out-reach programs in remote rural areas.

The UAE Women's Federation has as its objectives: developing women's image and self-esteem, encouraging education and eliminating illiteracy among adult women, conducting evening classes for their further education, ensuring that social services and care reach women and their families, and helping women take better care of their families. Local women have learned to organize themselves, set up literacy campaigns, establish craft and vocational centers. Above all, the women's societies have prepared local women to play an increasingly active role in social development. Under Sheikha Fatima's leadership the Women's Federation has influenced many of the social developments which have given women a greater role in drawing up and executing social welfare projects, and in influencing future social policy.

The Emirates Center for Strategic Studies and Research (ECSSR)

The Emirates Center for Strategic Studies and Research established on March 14, 1994, in Abu Dhabi, United Arab Emirates, is an independent research institution dedicated to the promotion of professional research and educational excellence in the UAE and the Gulf area. ECSSR serves as a focal point for scholarship on political, economic, and social issues pertinent to the UAE, the Gulf, and the Middle East regions through the sponsorship of empirical research and scientific studies conducted by scholars from around the globe. The Center seeks to provide a forum for the scholarly exchange of ideas on these subjects by hosting conferences and symposia, organizing workshops, and sponsoring a lecture series featuring prominent sponsors and international dignitaries, and through the publication of books, research papers, translated studies and two occasional paper series. Through these and other activities, ECSSR aspires to engage in mutually beneficial professional endeavours with comparable institutions worldwide, and to significantly contribute the general educational and scientific development of the UAE.

Women Research Program
The women of the UAE have traditionally been heavily involved in agriculture. In the era before oil, while the men would travel with their camels, or to take part in the pearling and fishing industry, the women stayed at home to look after not only the children, but also the agricultural livelihood of the family. The woman's role was never totally confined to raising children and looking after the family.

Over the course of the past few years, a number of achievements have underlined the progress made by the women of the UAE in the years since the establishment of the federation in 1971. Building on their traditional involvement in the country's economic life, women in the UAE are now emerging as tertiary students, teachers, doctors, workers and leaders. The first locally-trained women doctors graduated from the Faculty of Medical and Health Sciences of the Emirates University, the first woman pilot, graduated from the Dubai Aviation College and the first class of professional women soldiers passed out from their basic training in the UAE Armed Forces, all entering professions that, a mere 20 years ago, would have been almost inconceivable for the women of this fast changing state. The catalyst of this quiet revolution has been education, and today 98% of the female population of school going age, is attending school at one level or another. They also dominate the UAE's higher education establishments, forming 70% of the students at the Higher Colleges of Technology and over 60% at the UAE University.

The Women National Committe is a government consultative technical committee founded in 1996 in accordance with the Resolution of the Council of Ministers No. (97) of 1997 to be concerned with women’s programs and activities in the various spheres and charged within effecting co-ordination with the local and international governmental and non-governmental bodies and organizations of relevance to women’s issues and activities.

Tasks:
Formulate general strategies and policies for the programs and activities of Yemeni persons in a manner that is compatible with the issues of persons and society.
Co-ordinate the efforts exerted by the governmental and non-governmental bodies and institutions to consolidate women’s standing in the various spheres and increase awareness of the importance of the role of the women as an economically productive and effective force. Evaluate women’s programs and activities so that these proceed within the framework of general strategies and policies formulated for women’s activities.
Combat poverty.
Raise the standard of education.
Reinforce the health situation a manner that leads to the creation of a better role for the participation of woman in building and develops her capabilities and thus the development of society.
Extend consultancies to the local and foreign governmental and non-governmental quarters on the programs and activities that are compatible with the general strategies and policies related to women’s activities.

IV-RESULTS

The results obtained during this research on the Arab and International ngos concerned with women and development matters are the following:

A-NGOs and “Women, Intangible Heritage and Developement

The problem of women’s condition as a whole and its relationships with NGOs depends on the economic, political and cultural situation prevailing in each country or in relation to each ethnic group. Thus, Iraqi NGOs are actually preoccupied by the pauperization and its repercussions on the increase of women’s and infant’s mortality; while the Kurdish women’s NGOs of Iraq ask for the independence of Kurdistan. On the other hand NGOs of the U.A.E work for the higher nuptial rate of local young girls. In Palestine women’s NGOs heavily contribute in the Intifada movement. In Egypt, women’s fertility and their health problems are alarming. In the African Arab countries a mobilization against the practice of exision is observed.

1-Women NGO's in the Arab World
There are two groups of NGOs intended for women in the Arab World. The first group is essentially interested by health and well being of women (care for mother and child, drugs, AIDS, old age…). Therefore, social work constitutes their major goal. The second group focuses on the theme of women and modernity. In fact, rapid modernization of the institutions and of the infrastructure of Arab countries jeopardize the traditional status of women and their role attached to the patriarchal society. This change leads to the creation of NGOs claiming the access of women to more equal rights statuses and rights in most of the countries. Thus, numerous are the NGOs demanding for "woman's emancipation" or for her "liberation", for her right to learning, to work and to political participation. Their objectives call for integral change of the value system and of patterns of behavior or of traditional thoughts. In general, they propose maintaining a distance or total break from non-material culture judged constraining and degrading for women.

2- NGO and Development

NGOs that consider development as a major objective carried many political actions towards women and intangible heritage:

a-Exploitation of knowledge and traditional know how of women

NGOs working in the development sector try to improve the knowledge and the know how of women by modernizing them.

Traditional subsistence knowledge

-Development of activities for women in Jordan and Syria: FAO Project

Since 1992, a FAO Regional Project has tried to identify appropriate approaches aiming at the integrated management of natural resources through the identification of sustainable development models with the participation of the concerned villagers communities and in direct cooperation With the Forestry Department in the partner countries: Syria and Jordan. The field activities have been focused on some selected pilot areas. According to the fact that the action of the Project concerns the rural communities and the important role of women in natural resources management, it is necessary to implement a strategy aiming at integrating women in the actual or future project activities.

Women play an important role in almost all agriculture and livestock activities of the household and in man`, cases their participation exceeds the one of males. Most of them take part in livestock raising particularly in feeding (included grazing) and watering although the importance of this activity depends on the size of the flocks. A few of them, rarely and especially in Jordan, have developed small income generating activities to improve the living standards of the family and the household security. Whenever women receive an income, the resources represent resources for food security. Thus, women shoulder a major share of the responsibilities for household food security. They are more likely than men to spend a given income on food for the family. That is the reason why income generating activities are options and alternatives to overexploitation on heavy pressure on limited natural resources (forest and pasture resources). As a result of their full participation in the economic and well being of the household, and according to the fact that in rural areas the household is dependent on the use of natural resources, we can see that women play a key role in that field.

Some women are employed by forestry services (especially in nurseries where they represent the majority of the employees; in Syria some of them are employed by forestry services in a forestation and maintenance activities generally as part-timers). According as most of the state nurseries are located close to cities. They are no nursery employees in villages covered by FAO Project. Most of nursery workers come from cities and not from farms. Consequently such an activity is not directly, related to natural resources management but can be regarded as any paid work. The majority of female workers come from very poor households, in which the living conditions are very bad and the female income essential to satisfy the basic needs.

In Syria and Jordan, populations have been excluded from playing any participatory role in management of the natural resources. Up to now the use of the state forests and range-lands are regulated by the administration; farmers and raisers are neither organized nor associated to their management according to the restrictive and repressive forestry legislation (both in Jordan and Syria). In Jordan range-lands are under state control. In Syria there are no state range lands in the Project's area and crazing maybe authorized in forests under conditions.

Although the majority of women participate in decision-making within the family. This remains the privilege of male heads of households within the patriarchal structure of the family. As male are not yet associated to the natural resources management (forest and range lands), women do not have any specific role in the decision making process in issues related with forest use and management. The only exception is the one of collecting and transporting firewood for household use, and many women have a wealth of traditional knowledge and experience on the different use of some products. Their knowledge on the medicinal values of leaves, barks, flowers, roots, seeds and saps, the food and fodder value of the local species, the quality of different firewood, etc. are an important asset.

The Applied Research Institute of Jerusalem (ARIJ), in cooperation with other Palestinian agricultural institutions, has identified rainfed farming as one of its four priority research programs for promoting authentic development in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.
Since rainfed agriculture is the most predominant pattern governing farm systems in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, it is imperative then to have more understanding and insight of the agro-ecological characteristics and the socio-economic relationships that have evolved within the Palestinian farm communities in their continuous attempts to cope with the environment and maintain their livelihood.
Programs that aim at developing this role of rural Palestinian women. A wealth of information about how these organizations perceive developmental programs for rural women now exists. However, it is difficult to say accurately how many of these programs meet the real needs of rural Palestinian women, or how rural women themselves perceive their role in agriculture.
Women constitute one of the main sectors of the farming labor force that has been unaccounted for and neglected in agricultural economies. The changing economic agricultural environment has forced many farmers to abandon farming work and seek more reliable sources of income outside the farm, thereby leaving the land in the hands of women. Inevitably, women are then the major contributors to farm work and perhaps the main providers in the farming communities. Helping rural women to enhance traditional needlework or better prepare homemade jams and pickles may be successful programs for furnishing rural households with supplemental income, yet it is recognized that the role of women in practical terms also includes agricultural work in family farm practices as weeding, planting, sowing, fruit picking, marketing family produce and often decision making.
Rural women in general work with energy and considerable courage. Small babies are carried along, young girls come along to help. Women's responsibilities lie in picking fruit such as olives. Collection of animal fodder is also usually the responsibility of women. They gather grass, branches, leaves and fruit to feed small domestic animals such as goats, rabbits and poultry which are kept for their milk and meat.
Health and healing

-Noor al Hussein Foundation (Jordan) started a Medicinal Herbs Project which enables women to turn their home gardens and unexploited lands into market garden for aromatic and medicinal herbs such as thyme, sage and chamomile. The herbs are then sold as beverages or as raw materials for medicines. Launched in villages in North of Jordan with technical support from the Jordan University of Science and Technology, the scheme trains women to plant and supervise herbal gardens and to process, package and market their herbs in tea bag form or as condiments.

-Mercy Corp International (Lebanon) created women’s association in Akkar North-Lebanon. The aims of those groups are to enhance their knowledge the medicinal values of leaves, barks, flowers, roots, seeds and saps, to better prepare traditional cuisine (muneh) or homemade jams and pickles. All the products are sold in the market.

Material/Artisanal Culture

-Embroidery is a traditional craft loaded with values and national symbols for Armenian and Palestinian refugees in Lebanon, Syria and Jordan. NGOs attending to both populations try to teach women this skill.

- Inaach al Moukhayam and Al Najdeh NGOs founded by Palestinian and Lebanese women dedicated themselves to support embroidery work of Palestinian women in the camps of Lebanon. This embroidery was interrupted since 1948 and was resumed and developed. In fact, «Palestinian costume included an outer garment covered with embroidery, and there was an accompanying headdress (p.40). (The) traditional Palestinian folk embroidery was an art, with the various patterns, color schemes and type stitchery passed down through the generations. It filled an artistic need, and added a feminine touch to otherwise drab garments. Older village women taught the younger ones, who in turn passed on the art to their daughters” (Leila Khalidi, The Art of Palestinian Embroidery, Saqi books, London, 1999, p.47).

- The "Mouvement Social Libanais" encourages turkmen women of Kouachra village in Northern Lebanon to redevelop local traditional craft in a way to disappear. Weaving mats with vegetal fibers gathered from the border of the river regained its activity since the mats transformed into cushions or bags increased the demand in the market.

-The National Handicrafts Development Project of Noor al Hussein Foundation (Jordan), established in 1985, has been instrumental in reviving traditional crafts and in preserving a unique aspect of Jordan’s cultural heritage. The project has encouraged craftswomen and men to produce innovative, high quality handicrafts, such as ceramics, embroidery, woven rugs and wool products for domestic and international markets. It has also produce hand-woven baskets, which trains rural women to produce hand-woven baskets from palm and banana leaves and to manufacture wooden roped stool, chairs and tables.

b-NGOs often replace women in the transmission of intangible heritage. In this case they leave them with few specific tasks.

- The uprooted populations (Palestinians) being Arab or else (Armenians, Kurds, Assyrians…) have the desire to safeguard their own identity to prevent young generations from forgetting their country. The NGOs of these groups collect elements of folklore (stories, music, songs, dance…) from women and teach them to children. Often, the data is published in books or integrated in youth clubs activities. In this manner it replaces women in the transmission of intangible heritage. Ex: The National Institution of Social Care and Vocational Training or the Arab Resource Center for Popular Arts-Palestinian Camps in Lebanon.

c-NGOs interventions on behalf of local populations either modify intangible heritage or eliminate it.

Health and healing

-Change induced by NGOs may lead to the coexistence of old and new models. In Yemen, for example, development NGOs train women to modern medicine. In this way, the implementation of training programs for women, especially the training of primary health care workers, known as murshidat. These programs are not only raising health service delivery to basic standards, but they are inclusive of the most marginal members of Yemeni society, especially the African-identified akhdam. Those women who with a minimum of a sixth grade education and one year of training in basic health, hygiene and sanitation, are bringing health services to their northern Tihama community. In so doing, the women are incorporating former outcastes (akhdam) and ex-slaves (‘abid) into the health care system, and by extension into other educational and economic opportunities available in contemporary society as well. By rendering health services to the lowest status groups in the social hierarchy, the murshidat are promoting the egalitarian ideals of Islam. The murshidat's home visits and daily routines in the various clinics or "rooms" where they conduct pre-natal check-ups, well baby monitoring and provide immunizations as well as routine deliveries and malaria treatments. This new role has changed their roles as women because they were no more mobilized by works of agriculture (Dr. Delores M. Walters).

Mukhtiya responsible for the preparation of the bride handle the task of teaching the latter a know how related to married life especially all that is related to sexuality. Mukthiya or shari'a is an integral part of most marriage ceremonies in Sanaa, as well as in a number of other areas in the country. This is the name of the woman who beautifies the bride and teaches her some facts of life. Families especially rich ones, still stick to this old tradition and assign the woman with advising the bride on certain health and sexual habits. She also advises her not to let her husband touch her until he gives her a certain amount of money or golden ornaments. This woman is professional and has no other work to do. She seizes the opportunity of marriage festivals to sell combs, rings and other ornaments to women attending the ceremony. Today, the tradition of shari'a is withering away except in old Sanaa, Hajja and Thula. Most brides prefer to go to modern salons for beautification, and schools, friends, families usually fill-in the information the bride needs to start a family.

Traditional subsistence knowledge

-In Sudan, Community Aid Abroad supported women saving time and gaining skills and strength: The Milebeda Grinding Mill. “The mill began working in March 1993. It aimed to save women's time so they could participate in other productive and recreational activities. As well it was hoped that women would gain skills in managing and running a small business and small-scale rural cooperatives and women's organizations in the region would be strengthened. Previously the women had to walk to Kas to grind their millet and sorghum. Alternatively they could use the traditional method of grinding their grain between two stones - a very exhausting and time-consuming process. As well, the mill has been a very successful income generator. The women have gained skills and confidence, and learned to work as a team reaping the benefits of cooperation. The mill is now being used by seven other villages as well as Milebeda. The small profit is funding a daily literacy class for 65 women. The project has shown that women in traditional rural societies can, with assistance, play great roles in changing societal attitudes and ideologies for the better”.

-In Djibouti, a "development project of traditional fishing" done by The International Fund for Agricultural Poor came against resistance of the social background. From the beginning, one of its objectives was to initiate women to trading and transformation of fish but the social context did not favor their insertion in the employment market. However, some women showed much interest in the fishing activities (up to then reserved to men). They have created outdoor retail shops in the neighborhoods or have learned to cook fish and sell it. Fishing alone remained an exceptional activity for women (there is only one fisherwoman in Djibouti).

-In Syria, the Pasture, Forage and Livestock program (ICARDA) introduced innovations at the level of women' work and their role in decision making in Bedouin societies of the northern part of the country. They were attributed new tasks such as mixing the forrage and additional feeding of the cattle. They also learned how to master household expenses by multiplying contacts with the market.

3-Individual initiatives or private collective Intangible heritage is valued and safeguarded thanks to the initiative of individuals alarmed by its disappearance.

a- Individual initiatives

Oral literature

-In Lebanon, the risk of forgetting children' stories told by Druze women in the moutain, urged Mrs. Leila Da Cruz to record them on tapes "my grand mother's tales" and to broadcast them.
Material/Artisanal Culture

-In Syria, Mme Heike Awad created a workshop in 1988, working in the field of prevention of the “women art” embroidery or textile arts which involves also weaving, tasselmaking, patchwork felting, knitting etc. The workshop was founded as an income-generating project for Palestinian refugee in the camp of Yarmouk (near Damascus) but Syrian women especially from the villages started to work to. Today the workshop gives work for 300 women. The women are taught the old techniques because the aim of the workshop is to prevent the old textile arts by studying, teaching and producing textiles in the old style and developing modern designs, build on the old heritage.

b- Collective Initiatives

Religious expression

In Damascus, Kurdish women of the Naqshbandi sisterhood preach Kaftarian Islam in mosques and houses. The transmission of this religious knowledge is accompanied by teachings insisting on the traditional role of women at the heart of the family as a mother and devoted wife. (Böttcher Annabel, L’Elite Féminine Kurde de la Kaftariyya, une confrérie naqshbandi Damascène, les Annales de l’Autre Islam, n°5, INALCO-ERSIM, Paris, 1998)

Oral Tradition

- In Morocco, five women originally from Marrakech region dance and sing to the rhythm of percussion instruments executing traditional music of their original tribe, the Houara (a region between Taraoudant and Tiznit), the Hammaa (Heights of Dara'a plateau), as well as berber danses and the urban repertoire like the Aïta (Cha'abi (the popular style that gave birth to Raï).

- In Algeria, the three women of the 'Djurjura" band (named after the kabyle mountains) sing their mother's songs. These kabyle songs remind of every day life. They are hummed every day as during feasts and ceremonies. Thus, "Djurjura" tries to restore oral tradition.
Artistic expression

-In Mauritania, traditionally blacksmith females were assigned to embellish women in the camps. They kept this specialization in town while adapting it to urban life conditions and to new techniques. In this way, beauty parlors were opened inside which they often worked more than two and sometimes even four on one client. Many of them are members of the chamber of women's handcraft professions.

The women of Soninkes villages also decorate the interior walls of their homes. They generally use natural pigments and apply them to freshly painted walls.

4- The state intervenes for the safeguarding of intangible heritage

-In Tunisia, "L'Institut National du Patrimoine" intends to make an "Inventory of art professions and women's artisanat in Tunisia". The latter is at the same time an integral part of the collective memory and a factor for long lasting development.
Moreover, it is about the transmission of the most representative and specific techniques of the know how to younger generations. The results of this project will be published in the Tunisian magazine "Arts et Traditions Populaires".

- Furthermore Tunisian state founded a folklore dance company. It revalues urban as well as rural ceremonial traditions by body language, choreography, singing, and music.

Conclusion

After this rapid overview of the question "Women, Intangible heritage and Development we can draw the following conclusions:

1-The ethnic and community diversity of the Arab World and consequently its impact on Intangible Heritage acquired and transmitted by women is unequally transparent through all the areas approached. A collection of data is essential at this level to value the wealth and cultural diversity of the region. It is necessary for a thorough understanding of the general problem formulation complexity.
2-A description of the evolution of the Arab World's different lifestyles influenced by social, economic, and political changes in the countries as well as by globalization will bring light to the question. In fact, the definition of the woman's status, of patterns (models) of behavior of each lifestyle and the degree of contribution to economic production would explain the degree of permeability to development.

3- A systematic bibliographic research should be undertaken in every country to make an inventory of the works done on the subject. It may also allow for an evaluation of the changes occurring at the level of Intangible Heritage acquired and transmitted by women, and eventually their effect on development. Finally, it will clear the various axes of which the general problematic has already been studied.

4-The problem formulation "Women, Intangible Heritage and Development" joins various dynamics depending upon individuals and their collectivities. It is located at several social levels in each country. In fact, individual initiatives vary between ethnologic emergency practiced by non-specialists, folklore groups, and private enterprise aiming at revaluing heritage. As for NGOs, they have very different objectives. Therefore, some women's associations claim equal rights between men and women. They implicitly ask for the change of the value system and of established cultural models. Others are more pragmatic and take care of social problems affecting women. On the other hand, NGOs that focus on development are concerned with Intangible Heritage either to explain certain behaviors related to health, hygiene and reproduction, or to offer job opportunities to women in developing ancient handcrafts or know-how. The most systematic activity is the state’s one because it covers all the country and can define a policy of development at a general level.
